Dear Planning Inspectorate,

As an artist I love painting on the vegetative shingle of Sizewell Beach... Horned poppies, Sea kale, Sea Campion and more. Yes, this place has a wild beauty, but equally important is the unique marine environment it provides for hundreds of species including butterflies, bees, and adders - all important contributors to the eco system. There are only 6 such sites in the UK but this wonderful beach is now under threat from the plans to build Sizewell C and cover much of this important rare and valuable habitat with concrete.

On Sunday 600+ protesters, marked out the boundary in the form of a human wall, to demonstrate what will be left of the beach at Sizewell if this ill thought out new nuclear power station is built. It was graphically clear that this build, which will be the biggest construction site in Europe, cannot help but have a massive detrimental effect on the flora, fauna, wildlife and of course wider environment and I worry that this form of nuclear power will probably be redundant technology by the time it is due to be finished in over a decades time.

I'd like to object strongly to this project.

Yours sincerely,

Helen Riches
