

As I have set out before, this is far far far too big. We are ruining forever high quality farmland and the very thing that makes England great: its rurality and green sloping hills and farmland. It is not right to decimate it with solar panels on this scale when they can all be put on buildings or in less elevated, visually intrusive sites and more dispersed. To then hear BESS is being used with the known fire risks and public health issues on top is beyond the pale. We cannot have these horrific bombs close to houses and all over the picturesque landscape. That is so over the line of acceptable that you can't even see the line. Please someone stop this madness especially the BESS and the overall scale before it kills villagers, the villages and the last bit of countryside between Ashford and Hythe/soon to be Otterpool forever.
