Objections

I have written my objections to this idiotic idea of solar farms down at least twice and sent them to the relative departments. I trust that whoever is making the decision of yay or nay has read them diligently and taken note. To keep on repeating my points of view is therefore a waste of time for the recipient but I do have a couple more to add to what I have said.

A) Science is developing new projects as we speak ie: window glass that will collect the sunlight therefore the panels will be superceded by those.

B) Just because we are having very unusual amounts of sunlight this year does not mean this will become the norm.

C) The amount of co2 released from China during the making of the panels would be equal to making them here so we can't pretend the release of co2 will therefore not be counted.

As before, obviously I treasure my life here in this beautiful, peaceful countryside ten million times more than a person living in a suburban area. So what will it be like here when the panels are disintegrating and useless, and the battery parks no longer useful to anyone?
