

I am a resident of Botolph Claydon and my property backs onto the fields that will house solar panels. If one was to look, from an upstairs window to the rear of the property, across meticulously farmed and productive fields with wooded areas and further fields stretching back to a stunning horizon, it would be quite obvious that this countryside should not be disturbed in order to make way for the enormous infrastructure that is in planning.

I also travel fairly frequently to Oxford, so have been choosing the Edgecott route to the A41. The other way via Marsh Gibbon was, and still is to some extent, fraught with road closures and awful potholes, as we have had years of disruption due to the HS2 and EWR construction. If the access road to the construction sites, which I gather, will be from the Quainton area of the A41, I foresee the same road closures and road deterioration that probably would result from heavy traffic movements. It's a lot for country roads to take and even the A41 can only take so much.

I also cycle locally on a small scale, and it is nice to be out in the open countryside taking in views. This pleasure will surely be compromised.

Thank you for your time.
