

The whole process has been steamrolled past all forms of local knowledge and true advice from custodians of the land. The promise of increased grazing as an acceptable continuation of agricultural use is legally not defined nor committed to. Numerous existing projects have made these promises only to see sheep moved on at the earliest convenience, sighting health and safety concerns and other welfare issues. This is great food producing land that should be protected at all costs - not thrown into mystery ownership ending ultimately in no accountability or funding to remove the panels and return the land to its former (or in their words "improved") conditions. The land will simply become a graveyard for derelict panels and worn out batteries. This is without the environmental issues of run off, habit destruction both on the sites and all surrounding areas with unsuitable roads and access points that will have to be abused and altered to even get the build started.
