

I am not local to this proposed grotesque affront to a wonderful, wild and relatively untouched place. It is not only locals who will keenly mourn the needless loss of such a special place, but also those from far away who have grown to love this unique place.

It is often warned that the UK is one of the most nature depleted places on this earth, but this seems to go over any type of developers head. The thought that machinery, lights and noise will not harm, that skirting particular areas of botanical interest will have no impact does not disturb them or give rise to a moments reflection of the irrevesible damage that will be done.

It has been told many times during these consultations exactly what harm this development will do to the wildlife and how it will impact and damage the saltmarsh, Change Request 1 will not make any difference to the destruction of nature, people's lives or to biodiversity locally but quite possibly could impact species and their survival on a worldwide scale. PLEASE RETHINK.
