

There has been no one from the National Grid that has done a full investigation to see if the hoverport at Pegwell bay is sustainable with all the works that they plan to do. It was left for the wild when the hoverport shut down over 30 years ago and the hoverport has rare plants that have sustained and continues to grow there is also bats that also reside in the area, also Seals live in the proximity. If the National Grid take the whole of the hoverport then we will loose much more than just the concrete area we will loose the rare plants, the animals and some people go there for the peace and tranquility which the hoverport brings which is good for peoples mental health. Thanet has lost a lot of it's green spaces due to buildings being built. Kent was named the Garden of Britain and now it's not. It is becoming like London too many green spaces being turned into a concrete jungle.
