

Darryn de la Soul

The main issue is the devastating impact on wildlife in an area, the hoverport, that is already rewilded and a haven and refuge for thriving non human life. We are in a climate and biodiversity emergency, so areas like this are incredibly precious and once gone, they're gone. We cannot afford to lose more areas like this when we have already-damaged brown and grey field sites that could be used. The whole National Grid project is ill thought out and seemingly determined to forge ahead without seriously considering other sites.